Online learning participants needed!

Dr. Shalin Hai-Jew of Kansas State University is conducting a study about MOOCs (massive open online courses) and would like to invite any who are interested to participate.

This online survey hopes to sample some current insights, attitudes and concerns about massive open online courses (MOOCs) to get a sense of the feasibility and adoption of MOOCs by various universities and colleges. This will be conducted as an electronic study to capture the insights of practicing faculty and administrators in higher education, particularly those who have been involved with online learning.

This survey will be available from May 3-31, 2013. This is a four-part survey, which will likely take 20-25 minutes to complete.

The responses may be used in a forthcoming academic publication that is double-blind peer-reviewed if the work passes muster with the editors.
